SubSlush order f79c4d7c

hello < hello@subslush.com >

SubSlush < hello@subslush.com >

Sun, 01 Feb 2026 3:30:24 AM +0100

To "subslush"<subslush@ssh.33m.co>

Hi there, I'm Alex 🙂

First of all, I'm really sorry for the slow reply. Our live chat coverage is limited on weekends, and the team there can only help with general product questions, so anything account or order specific usually needs to be picked up by us afterwards.

On your question about the account being "new", yes, it's a private account provisioned for you. Depending on the product, it may not always be created at the exact moment your order is delivered. With Google products in particular, we sometimes use slightly older Gmail accounts because Google tends to treat established accounts as more trusted than brand new ones, which reduces the risk of unexpected security lockouts or extra verification steps. It doesn't mean it's "someone else's account" or shared. It's still provisioned for you and intended to be used only by you.

On security and privacy, no one is monitoring your account. Our fulfillment team uses a secure, temporary environment to apply the subscription, and once the subscription is active we log out and permanently delete that environment so our access is limited to what's strictly necessary. If you'd like extra peace of mind, you can also check your Google account activity yourself to see sign ins and recent access. Google explains how to review that in their help documentation.

About why some products are on new accounts and others aren't, it varies by service. Google AI is provisioned on a new account by design, and you'll see that during checkout and in the product terms. Spotify can be applied to an existing account, but it requires a one time manual login to activate, so some customers prefer a new account there too. Other products like Adobe Creative Cloud or Duolingo can be applied using just an email without us needing to access the account at all. And a few products are delivered as redeemable codes. It's different for each service based on how activation works and what creates the smoothest, least risky delivery.

For YouTube, yes, it's currently provisioned on a new account as well. We're exploring whether existing account activation can be offered later, but Google's security can make that messy because logins from new devices and locations can trigger lockouts that require customer involvement. We're trying to avoid putting customers in that situation.

On refunds, I want to be upfront. Once a subscription has been activated and delivered, we're not able to offer refunds under our terms and refund policy. We can cancel and refund if a customer reaches out before delivery, but after activation there's unfortunately not much we can do because the service has already been provided.

I understand this might not be the response you were hoping for, but I hope you'll still give it a fair chance and try it out. I am positive you'll end up enjoying it. Please follow the instructions provided to you, and once the required time has passed, you can change the password, add your own recovery details, and keep an eye on your account activity to make sure no one else is accessing it.

Best regards,
SubSlush Support

SubSlush